Society Publishes Post Cards

The Society's second series of historic buildings post cards was issued in November. The cards picture pencil drawings by Irwin J. Kappes of the Bowne House, Christ Church, Marlpit Hall and Old First Church. The Bowne House, pictured here, is likely receiving its first post card portrayal. Each of the drawings is on exhibit in "Middletown: Through Artists' Eyes".

A set of four costs $1.00. The cards are on sale at the museum and at the Middletown Railroad Station. The first series is also available for $1.00. It pictures our museum, the Murray Farm House, the Shoal Harbor Marine Museum and the old Middletown Railroad Station. Township scenes are rarely offered on post cards now. The Society is pleased to revive them. Of course, many will find them too attractive to mail. Start a collection. We hope to continue the series.

Meeting Notice

The next two meetings are January 26 and February 23, Monday nights at 8:00 PM at the museum. January is likely to be interesting as we open discussion on whether or not to adopt a master plan.

Marion Carlson Gives Oil

Marion Dziezyc Carlson gave the Society an oil painting picturing her farm located at Red Hill and Bamm Hollow Roads. It is signed "Tush", Mrs. Carlson's first married name, and dated 1952, the year following the Tush's purchase of the farm. The painted scene is changed now only by the absence of a barn, which was destroyed by fire.

The farm is smaller now than when purchased by Mrs. Carlson's uncle in 1922. He cleared wooded growth, raised chickens and sold eggs. He built and sold houses on Red Hill Road, reducing the farm to seven acres. The most popular crop today is raspberries, making Mrs. Carlson inclined to call her unnamed property "Raspberry Farm". Let that be the name of our painting. Since life often imitates art, perhaps Mrs. Carlson will attach the name to the land, too.

Mrs. Carlson also grows flowers and shrubs. Her love for the land and flowers is readily apparent to passers-by. That same feeling is captured in oil. The painting is a proud addition to our collection.

Marion Dziezyc Carlson was born in Carnegie, Pa, but spent her early years in Poland. She returned to the United States in 1922 and was a member of the Middletown Township High School Class of 1929. Her artistic skills were expressed early, including the artwork for the school year book as indicated by this humorous example. Marion

Tax Law Change

The recent change in the Internal Revenue Code, to be effected in 1987, makes it advisable to reflect on the timing of gifts to non-profit organizations. Their tax reduction values will likely never be higher than in 1986. This is especially true for objects that have appreciated in value. The Society is eligible for tax free contributions under Section 501(c)3 of the Code. Please call Society President, Randall Gabrielen, 671-2645 if you wish to discuss a possible donation.

Henry T. Gulick - Middletown Folk Artist

Henry Thomas Gulick was an artist cast in the now classic mold of a successful old-timer taking up art in later years and blossoming in a second career. His near ninety years of living here, his Farmer's relationship with our land and his local subject matter earned him the name affectionately called "Middletown's artist." Henry Gullie was born in Manalapan Township, New Jersey, August 1, 1872. His family moved to the New Monmouth section of Middletown Township in 1874 and to a farm in the Holland district in 1880. He lived here for the rest of his life. The farm today is the site of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company building.

Gulick's early artistic training was minimal. He learned to draw as a youth and enjoyed copying in charcoal. Two drawings hung in the Gulick home for many years, copies of Landseer's "Monarch of the Glen", a stag popularized by an insurance company and Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," an enormously popular picture around the turn of the century, now in the Metropolitan Museum. Perhaps they presaged the talent that would later manifest itself in a different medium. Gulick spent a life crop of farm chores to long haul milk route to Atlantic Highlands. He raised fruit and would plant a new orchard on the birth of a child. Henry Gulick and the farmer Charlotte Emily Wicoff Field had four children. Henry could tell how disk and orchard was by looking at its corresponding child.

Gulick turned the farm over to son Joseph by 1946 and was suffering from arthritis. His children gave him a box of paints at Christmas that year with a note urging their use. And paint he did. Gulick sought guidance from non-local artists. Marshall Simpson, the best known of a "Middletown school" of local artists, urged him to paint on primed masonite. However, he would not tamper with Gulick's native talent, claiming later the best he did for Gulick was leaving him alone.

Gulick's subject matter was the local scene and familiar objects. He painted what he saw, what he recalled seeing or what he would have liked to see. His painting the old buildings of the area preserved images of some that are gone, particularly the Gulick farm. He recalled the past, with the 1888 view of the Gulick farm, painted 65 years later, a notable example. He took license to rearrange the landscape to satisfy his vision. Life imitated art in one instance. A 1954 painting of the Senator Hendrickson farm placed a non-existent pond in the foreground. The property owner liked the view and built a pond. Rail passenger approaching the station by passing under the bridge at Red Hill Road. The village is never in view, though it is located only about 200 yards to the north. Gulick created such a scene, however, painting a view of the village under the bridge, which borders the top of the canvas. Two frequent Gulick subjects are landscapes and interiors. Both exemplify an appreciation for composition and detail. Sections of his greater works are composed with an organizational structure enabling them to stand alone as separate images. Joined on canvas they form a whole that can alternatively be nostalgic, charming and vibrant. The farm scenes are also affecting. Such paintings include "Edwin Beevan's Apple Packing Shed," portraying busy farm hands moving crops that will not wait. "By Ely's Sales and Exchange Stable," a humorous portrayal of six horses viewed from the end of the horse that does not stare back and "Fireboard-Apples with Beecher Baskets," an evocative still life. Many interiors were created with details living came. An item in a crowded room was too important not to merit exacting placement. Gulick's best works were painted in the late forties through the mid-fifties, though he worked until the end in 1975. He exhibited in many group shows and had two one-man shows, one in a gallery and the other at Seton Hall University. His work was the subject of a major retrospective at the Middletown Art Museum in 1974. It consisted of 71 paintings and two early drawings. Gulick is in at least three museum collections: the Newark Museum, Museum of America and the Monmouth County Historical Association. His works are regularly on view at the latter.

The Middletown exhibit was accompanied by a well-illustrated catalog. It is the best guide to the public of...
Atlantic Highlands Formed From Middletown 100 Years Ago

Atlantic Highlands separated from Middletown Township by referendum and incorporated as a borough in 1887. Its early history, before and after separation, is intertwined with the Township meriting its telling here. The hills forming the northwest corner of Monmouth County were informally known as the Highlands of Navesink from the 17th through the 19th centuries. The designation was not a specific place, but a mountainous region today including parts of Middletown Township, Atlantic Highlands and the borough of Highlands. The latter separated from Middletown Township in 1900.

Prominent among early settlers was Richard Hartshorne, who settled at the protected foot of the hills on the shore of the North Shrewsbury River. Although his settlement has always been in Middletown Township, he may have given it a name often confused with Atlantic Highlands, Portland Point. Portland, also the name of the Hartshorne homestead, is thought to have been brought from Hartshorne’s native England, as Portland Bill on the isle through the 19th centuries. The designation of Portland was always in Monmouth County were in the northwest corner of Monmouth County.

The Highland section was given formally known as the Highlands of Navesink from the 17th century. Portland was named after the Borough of Portland in England, as Portland Bill on the Isle of Portland off Weymouth, Dorset County, resembles Sandy Hook and the surrounding hills. This definition of bill is a projection of land resembling a beak.

A “town” here in mid-seventeenth century parlance was nearly always a small group of houses. In the late 1860s, the name of Portland’s Middletown Village and Shrewsbury were all settled in the mid-1860s. A locale in the “middle” of Shrewsbury and Portland probably gave Middletown its name.

The Highlands of the Navesink section was a natural subject for resort development. This pleasant confluence of mountains and shore awaited the growth of transportation facilities and a leisure culture. Both came in the post-Civil War period. The first major hotel was located in today’s borough of Highlands. The Hartshorne’s Portland Hotel, in its heyday, was one of the most fashionable and popular of its kind.

The Highlands were early settlers of Leonardo, or Leonardo as it is known in the 1800s. Thomas Henry Leonard was born there in 1845, received his education in the local schools and rose to prominence as Superintendent of the Col Brier Academy and became a clerk in his father’s store. He bought the Brown farm in 1867, which later became much of downtown Atlantic Highlands.

The growth of leisure time and transportation led to major development of New Jersey areas in the late 1860s and 1870s. The Methodists founded Ocean Grove in 1869 under a plan where their organization would retain ownership of all land, granting only long-term leaseholds to “buyers” who paid their rent. The Methodists’ influence was strong elsewhere on the shore and an effort to assume civic control was to be initiated on Middletown’s bayshore.

The Penn Branch and Delaware Bay Railroad opened in 1860. It originated at Port Monmouth, making a southern route to Long Branch. Passengers reached the railroad by steamers sailing from New York City. The New York and Long Branch Railroad opened in 1875. It was billed as the “shortest route” to the Jersey shore. It was started in 1865, receiving passengers by steamer at Sandy Hook. The developer of a new town or resort needed a good transportation facility. Thomas H. Leonard realized this and organized the Bay View Transportation Company in the fall of 1878 prior to laying out building lots in 1879. His land included the streets surrounded by Bay View Avenue on the north, First Avenue on the west, Mountain Avenue on the south, and Third Avenue on the east. The company built not only the property but the road to the shore side of the beach. Transport difficulties were at least threefold, a lack of business, an unreliable New Jersey landing place on the beach, and the lack of a New York dock.

Excursions could be made by rail and local buses. Leonard lectured William E. Foster to open a hotel, “Foster’s Atlantic Pavillion.” It was established on the temperance principle to avoid the excesses which resulted from the sale of alcohol. Foster’s lease to Foster had three prohibitions on selling intoxicating beverages. His penchant for redundancy would repeat itself often when publishing his history.

Foster attracted twenty-nine excursions the first year and forty-two the second. The Johnstons applied by the Toms River Bank Register on April 25, 1900 when noting Mr. Foster’s twentieth anniversary of settling in town. He also served dinners to yachting parties and his pavilion became the meeting place for a number of organizations. The first years visitors included the Rev. James E. Lake, part of a Sea Bright Methodist Church excursion. He was first church leaders to form an association for the establishment of a resort. It was organized on February 11, 1881. Rev. Lake was in his name nearly 200 acres of farm land belonging to Edward Hooper, Thomas Leonard, John L. Patterson, Charles H. Woodward and Nathaniel Roberts and became president of the organization, the Atlantic Highlands Association. Its Methodist control was to be assured by a bylaw, establishing a twelve member board of directors requiring that four Methodist ministers and four other Methodist ministers or lay members.

Four directors need not have been Methodists. Paid in capital was $10,000, while the Association carried a large debt. The first sale of lots by auction was on June 1, 1881. Methodist clergy were prominent among the buyers of the sale which raised $30,075.

The Association sold its property and extended it 1,500 feet into the bay. Proximity to New York City was an important factor in the case of many. Reliable dock facilities not dependent on favorable tides were crucial to maintaining the advantage of the locale. Civic improvements financing was a constant and early real estate promotion vigorous. Optimism prevailed, particularly among the real estate owning directors, who declared a dividend in lots. The result was a steep decline in Association stock and loss of confidence in the property. It appeared more interested in their investments than the development of the community. Despite a railroad connection made in 1883 and impressive recreational facilities, business activity declined. The president, Rev. Lake, and the secretary, his brother, T. E. Thompson, were forced to resign. The Rev. Dr. E. C. Curtis was elected president and proceeded to reduce the Association’s debt by the sale of lots. Although he progressed, public improvements, particularly street lighting and road conditions, lagged. The public began to demand greater control of affairs by forming a borough. Opinion favoring its establishment was spurred by the efforts of the women publishers of the “Atlantic Highlands Independent.”

It was fairly simple for a small area to organize a borough in the 1880s. The 1844 New Jersey Constitution required an act of the legislature to create a new municipality. However, an 1878 act permitted areas of no more than four square miles to agree to the sale of no more than $5,000 to seek a referendum for establishing a borough by petition of owners of at least ten percent of the value of assessed property within its proposed borders. Borough authority included the power to raise a tax, it could raise minor taxes for local improvements. There was no source of opposition. Some voters did not want the burden of an additional tax in addition, the Association was strongly opposed to this challenge of its authority.

Voters chose a borough on March 7, 1887. The Association took legal action claiming that the legislature conferred upon their corporate body various municipal powers and that it could not be subject to a rule by a municipal corporation. The litigation was not resolved. The litigation would likely produce a fascinating story beyond the scope of this article. A comparison with another Methodist body that retained a semblance of temporal authority until recently, the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association, would be interesting. The community spent nearly $500 its first year and obtained the support of the populace as road conditions and street lighting improved.

Borough laws changed often in that period. The borough’s limited authority kept it an effective part of its township. The Middletown township committee met alternately in Atlantic Highlands and disbursed road money to the new borough. Roads for roads were a key municipal expenditure and patronage source in the decade around the turn of the century. A better claim on town’s road money was a factor in the borough movement.

Atlantic Highlands reincorporated in 1884. An 1894 state law totally separated boroughs from township authority.
Art Exhibit Opens

Kappes Drawings Featured

The exhibit "Middletown: Through Artists' Eyes" opened October 25, 1986. A members reception was held November 14, 1986. The exhibit will remain through April 27, 1987. The October newsletter described the paintings. We comment on the Irvin J. Kappes series of drawings of notable architecture.

The drawings and paintings are compatible in the exhibit, but they possess some noteworthy contrasts. A key one is number. There are twelve drawings in a consistent style, whereas there are no more than four paintings by one artist or in one style. Their number, dominating the southwest corner of the main exhibit room, command attention. A second is color, or its absence. Their first impression may be subtle, as they are drawn in pencil.

There is no "prettiness" of color, but a quiet dignity focusing the eye on form and line. The third is that they are works with a message: interesting architecture is plentiful in the Township. The buildings merit a careful look. Many of these notable buildings, for example the several on Kings Highway, are so much in our midst as to be too easy to take for granted. Others, such as the former Chapel Hill Lighthouse and the Bowne House, are virtually hidden from view. See the twelve drawings together, then the buildings individually. One hopes the exhibit heightens awareness and promotes appreciation for these buildings.

Mr. Kappes believes that one "knows" a building only by drawing it. He feels the relationship of eye to hand creates an understanding not otherwise obtainable. Your editor, who, like most readers, does not draw, thinks some of that understanding may be conveyed by viewing drawings. Look at the drawings focusing on composition and building lines. The drawings may change your perception of the buildings and increase appreciation. A "looking aid" for eight buildings can be obtained through post cards. See the Page 1 article.

16. Look around town or call the editor at 671-2645 if you hope to remember to list the locale in the next issue.

17. In 1929 property owners adjoining the newly built lake selected Shadow Lake from many suggested names because it reflected the area's quiet, restful ambience and since the tall trees surrounding the lake would cast shadows whether in sun or moon light.

18. Receipts from a play "Blind Life", written by Frank E. Hall of Highlands who had no playwriting experience when he became blind. It has a love plot and depicts living conditions of blind people, especially their industrial activities.

Carlson also had musical talents, singing second soprano in a young women's choir. Her specialty was Polish folk music, a subject that took her to Poland in 1934 to research Polish costumes at the University of Cracow Library. Marion also painted theater scenery.

Marion Carlson studied at the Newark School of Fine and Industrial Art. Her early work was landscapes, with a later abstract period. Marion's early married life was spent in Brooklyn, where she had a portrait studio in her apartment. She returned to Middletown in 1945.

Mrs. Carlson remarked that the present times are among her happiest. She has a productive, fond relationship with the ground, which responds beautifully to her careful, loving touch. She has had an accomplished artistic career. The Society is proud to have one of her works to share with future generations.
